and updating drivers is quite a risky job unless you're a more experienced user, that's for sure. And that's exactly the kind of issue Device Doctor tries to tackle, offering a user-friendly approach to make working with hardware drivers a breeze. Forthright tool to look for available driver updates The application has been designed with a single goal in mind: allow users to easily download and install new drivers for every single piece of hardware hidden underneath their PC cases. And it does that with ease, mostly thanks to a straightforward interface that automatically scans the existing hardware and lets users pick the drivers to update. Device Doctor downloads and installs new packages regardless of how many devices you pick, so it can be used for updating one or multiple items at the same time. What's more, thanks to its rather basic settings screen the application can also initiate a scan at system startup and detect if any driver update is available automatically. Plus, you can set up scheduled scans, either daily, weekly or on specific days. Create a restore point yourself in the demo version While everything sounds like milk and honey, it's not, and Device Doctor lacks some critical features that could play a key role in such an application. For example, it doesn't create a restore point or a backup to make sure everything is fine after updating the drivers in the demo version, so you need to perform the whole task manually every time. Which is quite comfortable when setting up scheduled scans. All in all, Device Doctor is indeed a handy piece of software but, as you can see, there are still some areas to be improved here and there. It does what it says though and works like a charm on all Windows versions. Extravagant nutrition: nutritionists and the mass production of health. As a result of the mass production of health, nutrition is becoming a multi-million dollar industry. It is hard to imagine a time when nutrition was not relevant to health and food was considered to be just another form of fuel. This paper critically examines the concept of extravagant nutrition and argues that excessive concern for the aesthetic qualities of food can take away from one's appreciation of and concern for the nutritional value of the food, particularly when the latter is relatively low. The mass production of health results in the replacement of nutritional knowledge with the idea that food must be designed to look good, even if it is not rich in nutrients. Using case studies, the paper discusses the issues of diet, nutrition and health within the context of the food industry and contemporary notions of beauty.
