Solucionario ciencia e ingenieria de los materiales 3 ediThe number of app developers looking to launch their first mobile games in 2018 is expected to exceed last year's tally, said a new report from Digi-Capital. Digi-Capital's forecast for mobile game launches for the year ahead is based on the firms it surveyed who use technology, business strategy and economics software to help guide their decisions. In its report, the firm said that the mobile gaming industry is expected to be worth $40 billion next year, up from $37 billion in 2017. Nozomi Game Studio, a Tokyo-based mobile game developer and publisher which makes Hello Moto, is celebrating its 10th anniversary. Founder and CEO Tetsuro Usui says that global audience numbers for mobile games have been growing rapidly, as players look for social experiences. This year's Nozomi Game Studio compilation, Nozomi 10, will feature a variety of new games including the western-style in-game RPG, Fantasy Run for TIME TO RUN. "With a global audience of 1.5 billion, nearly half are women. This is unprecedented and is a turning point in mobile games." The firm's report predicts mobile game spending will continue to grow next year, mainly driven by the need to spend on improving user experiences. "Global spending on digital platforms is expected to reach $432 billion in 2018, up from $305 billion in 2017, with mobile gaming marking one of the fastest-growing digital revenue sources." "Funding should continue to come from retail at $208 billion, social networking at $86 billion and publisher at $48 billion," it added. Despite spending on improving user experiences, "there is also much scope to increase the average revenue per user (ARPU) in order to boost profitability", said Digi-Capital. However, despite a high adoption rate of smartphones and a variety of high-tech marketplaces, "mobile gaming 3e33713323
